Since the 2015 Charleston Massacre, Confederate monuments have been removed from public places. The murder of George Floyd amid a global pandemic, however, accelerated the removal of these divisive monuments and memorials placed on the American landscape. The removal of these Confederate monuments called into question other monuments honoring enslavers, settler colonialists and other individuals. As monuments fall daily, this roundtable presentation will offer insights on this recent reconfiguration of public spaces and which monuments, if any, should potentially remain.
