'Green' Public Housing Eases Breathing

Low-income families living in green public housing may have fewer asthma attacks and other problems from respiratory conditions, according to a new study.
Good Health Goes Beyond Having a Doctor and Insurance

Part of Dr. Aletha Maybank’s medical training left a sour taste in her mouth. Her superiors told her not to worry about non-medical issues affecting her patients’ quality of life, she said, because social workers would handle it.

Racial Discrimination During Childhood May Speed Aging

Racial discrimination during childhood puts African Americans at greater risk for accelerated aging, a marker for premature development of serious health problems, and perhaps a shorter life expectancy, researchers report.

Improving Equity in Academic Medicine

Christina Chapman, M.D., studies ways to improve equity in health-care systems and the medical workforce to better meet the needs of the population.
